Alessia Capurro
Director of Communications

Alessia is an Italian national but as a child, she lived a chapter of her life in Africa. Since then, she knew her future would have brought her back to that continent's amazing wildlife and culture.

Alessia is now a knowledge management and outreach specialist dedicated to advancing sustainable wildlife management and conservation through community engagement and development strategies in several African countries as a UN consultant.

She is passionately working to create meaningful connections between local communities and environmental preservation, with a focus on translating knowledge into actionable solutions that support both wildlife protection and human well-being.

From the field

Community Outreach for Domestic

Vets working in wildlife areas play a crucial role in helping community animals as it fosters stronger relationships between wildlife and local communities. Their efforts not only provide education on animal health and conservation but also help prevent the spread of zoonotic diseases, which can jump between animals and humans. Additionally, they prevent diseases from being transmitted from domestic animals to wildlife, maintaining ecosystem balance and ensuring both human and animal health.
